Charny Programmer NotePad Requirements:What You Need to Know to Get the Upper Hand with Recruitment At some point or another, every company or organization that hires employees will at least glance at the employment application. Even more than just a document to be filled out, the application has a lot of power over the candidate. The more information there is, the more likely the prospective new hire is to hit the "submit" button. Here are the things you should know before you open up your program and start typing... Know Who You're Hiring For If you're hiring for multiple jobs, what should be included on the application? For example, if you're hiring a secretary, you might put a task code on the application, and have candidates answer those specific questions that pertain to that particular role. If you're hiring a landscaper, you might want to have them list their certifications or experience. Without knowing what they're trying to accomplish, it's a lot harder to determine whether your candidate is an out-of-the-box pick or the wrong person for your position. But, it also means that you have more control over the first impression you make. Set the Tone From the Start The more that hiring managers personalize the first time someone fills out an application, the more likely that person is to feel comfortable with the company. One example: Suppose that you're hiring for a customer service representative position. If you only have one of those positions available, you want to make sure your first contact comes from someone who wants to help. The b7e8fdf5c8
